Andrew Stanord has probably the most intelligent dog in Bar Harber, Brostle is a black-haired spaniel. A day or two ago Mr. Stanford found, upon driving to the wharf, that he had taken along a broom from the barn. He called Plossle, and in the presence of a crowd told her to carry the broom back to the stable, a quarter of a mile away. A broom is an awkward thing for a dog to carry in its mouth, but she trotted back to the stable carrying the broom between her jaws, avoiding pedestrians and poles.

In the past twelve or thirten years, as a result of much patient labor and vigilance, the Arab monuments of Calro are now in a far better condition than they were a dozen years ago. Decay which once seemed as inevitable as fate itself, has been arrested. As far as can be determined, no monument of importance has been allowed to grow more ruinlous, but, on the other hand, many mosques have been mit into a many mosques have been put into a thoroughly safe condition, and a few have been or are being completely re-stored. The carved woodwork, mosales, marbles, painted cellings, etc., have been mariles, painted ceilings, etc., have been restored, and the missing parts replaced by scrupulous copying of what remained of the original work. The workmen employed are indeed very nearly as skillful as the men who worked for the Mamiuk Sultans in the golden age of Arab art.
